"What on arth's the matter with them mer Squire?" somewhat petulantly demanded the bothered Jehn. "What are they abeout stopping the team and jumping out avery time they come across a loss whose or a big dandylion, or thistle in the road? Who are they, any how, "Squire?" he exclaimed in an agony of mingled curiosity and impatience. "Oh," quietly remarked our absorbed Greeian, "they are naturalists."

A few days after this the same team was songaged for this identical trip by a party of Bostonians. As they rattled along the turnpike through the Notch, one of them said to the driver, who was delightedly runnianting on the contrast between his present orderly company and the troublesome party he bad been so perplexed with a day or two before—"Good deal of travel along here this Summer? Ea, driver?"

"Was, considerable, this week or so," was the reply. "I suppose you have about as much as yo mountains don't "Pretty nigh," replied our Jehn of the wagon. "I had a queer party along the other day—the last before you. I never see such a set of fellows!"

"What were they like!"

"Like loonaties, mor'en anything else I know on! Why, I thought I should never git up to Crawiord's. Every once in a while they'd stop the team, and jumpout, and pick up a stone, or pull up a weed, and then one of 'em would preach a long sermon, and when he'd done, all the rest would chatter over it; and it was e'en a most as much as I could do to git 'em into the wagon agin, and as it was, it was daylight down before we got ter Crawford's."

"But who were these people?" inquired
the whole company of listeners in a breath.
"Dich't you find out?"

"Wal, not exactly, I axed their keeper who they were, and be told me they were naturals?"

The following paragraph we take from a correspondent of the N. Y. Observer. Although the traveling months are over, the hints it contains may be remembered with profit anocontains may be remembered with profit and ther season. Nothing can be more marker than the graceful case with which western men, when abroad enter into conversation and the offensive stiffness and mock dignity which characterize most castern travellers. How the western "fashion" in this regar-

— A gentleman by the name of Mitchell, who was a passenger on board the ill-faid steamer Arctic, was supposed to be lost, and in consequence, several persons who considered themselves heirs-at-law, took possession of his property and divided it among themselves, has very unexpectedly turned up at the St. Nicholas Hotel, New York, and commenced proceedings against the parties who have so unceremoniously assumed control of his goods and chattels.

Death has at last divided the oldest pair in from the following paesgraphs:

We had a large company, on an exceller

Mrs. Ludwick Snyder died few days since, in Buraside township, Clearwe and a large company, on an excellent boat, and all seemed disposed to make themselves agreeable and happy. It may not be amiss here to remnark, that many persons in travelling deprive themselves of a great enjoyment by an unreasonable exclusiveness. Whether it be pride, a fear of letting down one's dignity, or selfishness, or timidity, which prevents their fellow travellers from free social intercourse, (where there is found a gentlemanly exterior,) the result is the same. True benovolence is often shown in a frank and kind word to one who is a silent traveller, and perhaps without a friend. It is not obtrusiveness, if prompted by a right spirit; nothing contributes to enhance the enjoyment of travel more than kind, fraternal intercourse with those you may casually meet in your journey. While starched stiffness abd shyness rob one of more than half the anticipated pleasures of a summer's ramble. Stepping on board our little steamer at Buffalo to pass down Niagara river, a gentleman, (a banker form Chicago,) with great simplicity and frankness commenced a conversation with me. versation with me. From him I derived information on many points, of which I was imperfectly acquainted, and from my scanty store, I found that I was enabled to enlighten him also on some subjects, and in relation to some men, of which he was pleased to learn of me. We might have sat and looked domurely at each other, without opening our lips the whole passage, but we ventured to break through the etiquette of a formal introduction, and entered into a brisk conversation with all the simplicity, and I may add, the pleasure of children. I therefore adopted this course, as the rule of my subsequent journey, wherever I meet travelers who demeaned themselves as gentlemen; and I found it
